

Couch company thrived briefly in Medina

BANKRUPTCY: The Empire Couch Company went through several expansions but folded quickly

MEDINA — One of Medina's most prosperous businesses during the early portion of the 20th century was the Empire Couch Company established by Earl Card and Walter Marvin in 1901.

Prior to establishing a factory in Medina, the small outfit operated out of Middleport with mild success. After the company purchased the Big-nall Works facility and constructed a new building in its place, the business was sold to J. D. Smith.

With financial support from Alonzo Phillips, the company witnessed considerable growth during the following years.

The original factory was a 40-foot by 140-foot building equipped with electric lighting, heat, and hot water but demanded for merchandise forced the company to expand relatively soon after.

An image shows the facility after that expansion, the photograph taken on March 20, 1913 as part of New York state's assessment of land and property leading up to the 1913 to 14 expansion of the Erie Canal.

The three-story building was broken into four sections; the closest section consisted of lumber storage in the basement, a coating room on the first floor, and a stockroom on the second floor.

The next section contained a wood working shop in the basement, a staining and varnishing room on the first floor, and upholstery space on the second.

The next portion contained a room for preparing shipments on the first floor and a continuation of the upholstery space on the second.

The final section on the southern end was an office and cloth storage space. Several piles of lumber used for manufacturing furniture are visible in the distance.

When New York State started the process of expanding and widening the Erie Canal in 1913, the Empire Couch Company was given $13,888 for the land and buildings on this property and was forced to relocate to a new site on Orient Street near the intersection of Short Street immediately north of the railroad tracks. The forced relocation was a welcomed one as the demand for fine furniture built in Medina was growing at an exponential rate. Area newspapers praised the high quality of furniture made by the company and its high rate of employment.

The Medina Daily Journal published an article on Oct. 14, 1930 noting the company's steady and prosperous growth stating, "This plant does its share to make the wheels of industry in Medina go round and there is every indication that it will continue to do so in the future."

The Lockport Union Sun and Journal published an announcement the following year on Nov. 3, 1931 stating that the Central Bank of Medina was closing due to the decline of the bond market. With the majority of the company's funds held by that bank, the closure forced the Empire Couch Company to go bankrupt.

With the company's liabilities totaling close to $40,000 and assets equaling about the same, a bankruptcy auction was held and the property sold to William J. Gallagher's trucking outfit. With that auction in 1935 went a successful but short-lived Medina enterprise.
